Resolve, the Massachusetts-based support group for infertile couples, has received more than $250,000 since 1987 from companies that make drugs used in fertility treatment, prompting other consumer advocates to ask if there's a conflict of interest.

IVF clinics and doctors have also donated at least $68,000 to the national nonprofit group, which is headquartered in Somerville, according to a Globe review of records on file with the state attorney general's public charities division, dating from 1987 to 1995.

"That's why Resolve never wants to talk about the drug risks," said Lynne Millican, a registered nurse, who has had health problems since a fertility clinic treated her ...
